The advantage is that the storage capacitor (connected to SCR anode) value can be increased if needed, which increases the spark energy to handle the capacitance of a long fence. The Kettering type circuit has a limit on the spark energy as determined by the inductance and saturation current of the coil.

Most electric fences ive worked on have the small grey T/F generates about 200V this charges the 2 blue capacitors. The transistor looking object to the right is usually a SCR, this is triggered to dump the stored 200V dc across windings of the bigger T/F. This larger T/F feeds the fence. (similar principal to a CDI ign).
