However, you CAN replace just the fan capacitor by itself by moving the lead from the F or Fan terminal on the existing capacitor to your new capacitor, and then adding a jumper from the C or Common terminal on the old capacitor to the new capacitor. But FWIW - the units you have are probably better built than anything that you can buy today. MrMark - ...

The digital labeling method is a direct labeling method that only marks the number but not the unit, which is limited to two kinds of capacitors with the unit of pF and mF. For example, polyester capacitor or porcelain capacitor is marked with "3", "47", "680" and "0.01", which means 3pF, 47pF, 680pF and 0.01mF respectively.

The capacitor marking codes vary in their format according to whether the component is a surface mount device or whether it is leaded device, as well as the capacitor dielectric.

The original capacitors were 50/15 and the paperwork on the air conditioner and the factory says 55-15 so I called the factory to make sure by the way they were very nice and they said the 55-15 will work just fine. So I go to the rear air conditioner and install the new capacitor which is a 55-15 and I replace the 50-15 which was thoroughly rusted by the way ...
