My comment on quality is very true, you are confusing brand names with quality. Take your headphone example. True studio headphones are $1,000+ because they are built to an exacting standard in reproducing a very flat sound response. This is very hard to do and takes a lot of R& D, and it has to be consistent and exact over years of operation.

You are not tossing money at it just because of the brand name. With the cheap stuff that is all over the market, it's built to be as cheap as they can to compete on price. How long it last a year, does not matter much. When it comes to electrical stuff that I depend on working and not burning my place down, I don't skimp on quality.
